The draw death of classical chess: the 2018 WCC match between Magnus and Fabiano had 12 draws in a row, with no decisive results in the classical portion. This was terrible publicity for chess and chess got a reputation among casual players as "boring" or "solved" for top level players. Rapid games are simply more exciting to watch as a viewer.

I can understand the advantages of controlling the center of the board in chess, particularly in the early stages of chess. My question is whether or not you absolutely have to dominate the center to win? Can a person have a weak or merely moderately strong center and develop slightly off to the side...
